

Man-Building a Treatise on Human Life and Its Forces (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Man-Building a Treatise on Human Life and Its Forces The author has sought a title for this book which would clearly express its character. From infancy to mature years there is built up a physical and mental structure which occupies a place of special honor in the world of being. Man is but little lower than God. This statement is based on the high order of his powers. But he begins life in a condition of utter feebleness. He is, when he reaches manhood, so much more than the new-born child because of the operation of a building process which must be carried forward strictly under prescribed laws of development, if the largest results be obtained. This is not a text-book, but a book for general reading. Yet it embraces the broad principles of three distinct but interrelated departments of science - the psychological, the physiological, and the sociological - all belonging to human life. The faculties of the mind are here presented, their functions unfolded, and the methods of their training carefully stated.
